Hello,

I believe that requiring the option rather than being forced to have MS products (internet explorer, media player etc) installed by default is the right approach. In windows XP this had gotten much worse. As an avid computer user, student and part time IT pro I still haven't found a way to remove media player or MSN messenger.

I think this review summarizes the glaring problems I am trying to illustrate <http://www.redhat.com/about/opinions/xp.html> This problem will only get worse unless something of large proportion is done. In this case fines aren't really the answer, if my company made 1 billion dollars a month I wouldn't really mind being fined.

Thank you for your time,

Isif Ibrahima
